Helen Reilly - by Michael E. Grost - mikegrost.com

Helen Reilly (April 25, 1891 - January 11, 1962), was an American mystery writer known for a series of novels featuring Inspector Christopher McKee, head of the fictitious Manhattan Homicide Squad. She wrote mostly under her own name but also under the pseudonym Kieran Abbey.

Helen Reilly - Wikipedia

Dead Man Control is one of the most standard police procedurals of those that I've read by Helen Reilly. First published in 1936, it follows McKee of Centre Street--the other strong effort which I read previously. Reilly was one of the first authors to feature police procedure in her novels and she does it quite well here.

The Doll's Trunk Murder, by Helen Reilly. ... Although McKee first appeared in The Diamond Feather (1930), it was for his star turn in McKee of Centre Street (1933)--considered to have been Reilly's "breakthrough novel"--that he is best recalled. Of that work, Grost writes:

Killer Covers: The Doll's Trunk Murder, by Helen Reilly

Helen Reilly's reputation has perhaps suffered from writing too many HIBK style novels in the middle of her career. But her best works are original contributions to detective fiction. McKee of Centre Street is one of the best early police

HELEN REILLY At a time when many women mystery writers were still writing in the "Had-I-but-Known" school, Helen Reilly (1891-1962) began to write realistic police procedurals before Ed McBain ever saw the inside of a precinct house.

The Mysterious Bookshop: Neglected Author: Helen Reilly

Often cited as one of the earliest authors of realistic police procedurals, Helen Reilly began her series about Inspector McKee of Centre Street in 1930. But the McKee novels also have a strong romantic-suspense element, and this is definitely the emphasis in Compartment K. Todhunter is the main investigator with his boss McKee providing support from New York. (The NYPD's jurisdiction is rather wide-ranging.
